

From my childhood, two scenes have stood out in my mind. The process of germination of a small seed and its alteration to a beneficial beautiful plant, as well as the adversity of diminishing nature by human. The former made me vigorous, while latter sucked my whole energy.

When I grew up, I always asked myself: “Why is human always destroying, while mother- nature is such a great generator? Isn’t it true that the human being is a part of this nature?” I was really on a quest to preserve the world, and ameliorate the general points of view towards environment.

I had made my mind, I had to initiate teaching environmental issues to children as future decision makers of our world. To see the love which was donated to the nature by children and their enthusiasm for learning about the surrounding area certified that I am in the correct way. Year in, year out, I strove to teach conservational facts to children in almost all schools in Isfahan- my city. My experience in performing arts boosted my ability to communicate with people, and led me to write and perform some plays for introducing environmental facts to children, families, and other people in our society.

And finally, with assistance of my friends, I established a nature school in my region. The usual procedure in nature schools is to allow 3-12 years old children to act and play in nature freely as far as their safety is not affected. As facilitators, our duty is to observe children and not interrupt activities which are defined and preferred by them. Connecting with nature causes children become more powerful, mentally and physically, and eventually, will make some sense of responsibility toward nature in them.

I believe that each person is given a diverse responsibility for a special work; s/he can do it best and no one can do it as well as s/he can. The duty of individuals is to discover their abilities and their positions according to their talent and capacity. I am sure that as a part of my responsibility, I have to conserve environment through direct connection with society, and children, and I do my best to achieve my goals.
